

That kind of confirmation, to get the same answer by two different calculations, is very helpful. In this case, the method is the same for both calculations, but they are referred to different side combinations. A simpler example where such confirmation can be introduced is in finding an area like that shown at Fig. 58. You can either (left) add the areas of all the pieces, or (right) you can take the area of the enclosing rectangle and subtract the bits that are "missing"; correctly calculated, both arrive at the same answer.

In most books, the study of areas is pursued very formally. An interesting and useful variation can be the comparison of area with perimeter, which is the total length of line needed to enclose a certain area. Let's suppose we fix the perimeter at 60 units and compare the areas different figures will make.

Start with triangles (Fig. 59). First, a triangle with sides 15, 20 and 25 units. This satisfies the Pythagorean requirement for a right triangle: 15 squared is 225, 20 squared is 400 and 25 squared is 625. $225 + 400 = 625$, also $15 + 20 + 25 = 60$, as required for perimeter. For now, don't bother how we picked these numbers. The area of this triangle is half the rectangle 15 by 20, or 150 square units.

Take triangles of other shapes, for example one with sides 10, 24 and 26 units. This also satisfies the Pythagorean requirement: 10 squared is 100, 24 squared is 576 and 26 squared is 676. $100 + 576 = 676$ and $10 + 24 + 26 = 60$. The area is half the rectangle 10 by 24, or 120 square units, less than the first one. Note that its sides deviate more than the first one, 10 to 26, as against 15 to 25.

Let's round off the triangular areas with an equilateral (all sides the same) of 20 each side. We need to know the vertical height. The equilateral triangle consists of two right triangles, one side 10 units, the hypotenuse 20 units and what's the other side? Well, if $10^2 + x^2 = 20^2$, then x^2 must be $20^2 - 10^2$, or 300 square units. The square root of 300 is, approximately (we'll show how you find square root later in this chapter) 17.32 units. So the approximate area of the equilateral triangle is the same as the rectangle 10 by 17.32, or half the rectangle 20 by 17.32

Fig. 58. Area of figures of various shapes, with the same perimeter.
