Campos,Samuel Pienknagura,Jacopo Timini,2023-12-08 We study the evolution of trade globalization in a set of countries in Latin America mostly the largest ones and Asia over the past 25 years Relying on structural gravity models we first estimate

a proxy of trade globalization that captures the ease of trading internationally with respect to trading domestically Results indicate that the evolution of trade globalization since the mid 1990s has been similar between the two regions but very heterogeneous within them Trade globalization has been particularly strong in agriculture mining and manufacturing but has lagged in services The paper also documents that trade globalization has been particularly strong in agriculture mining and manufacturing but it lagged in services Within region heterogeneity is associated to a set of trade policy instruments including tariffs non tariff measures WTO membership and trade agreements Next we quantify the economic implications of the estimated globalization trends Simulations of a multi sector trade model point to heterogeneous long term impacts of globalization on GDP some countries exhibiting substantial gains and others experiencing large losses with no single sector playing a preponderant role
