

Climate Change and Population Dynamics in Nepal

-Ramesh Kumar KC<sup>1</sup>

Climate change a global concern: Climate change refers to long-term changes in temperature, precipitation, and other atmospheric conditions on Earth. It is largely driven by human activities, particularly the burning of fossil fuels and deforestation, which release greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxide, and water vapor into the atmosphere. These gases trap heat, leading to a warming of the planet. Climate change is manifested through various impacts, including melting glaciers, rising sea levels, extreme weather events, shifts in precipitation patterns, and disruptions to ecosystems. These changes have far-reaching consequences for the environment, biodiversity, and human societies.

The impacts of climate change are felt globally, but certain regions are more vulnerable due to their geographical location and socio-economic conditions. Developing countries, especially those in Africa, Asia, and small island nations, are often the most affected. These areas may experience more frequent and intense extreme weather events, such as droughts and famines, typhoons and hurricanes, landslide and floods, threatening agriculture, water resources, and overall livelihoods. Additionally, marginalized communities within both developed and developing nations often bear a disproportionate burden of the impacts, lacking the resources and infrastructure to adapt effectively.

Globally, a unified initiative is unfolding to address climate change, with pivotal milestones like the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) since 1988 and the influential Brundtland Report in 1987 from the World Commission on Environment and Development (WCED) serving as a foundation. These endeavors emphasize the interplay of environmental, social, and economic factors, advocating for a harmonized approach. Bolstering this collaborative spirit are key developments such as the Kyoto Protocol in 1997, the forward-thinking Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs - 2015), and the significant Paris Agreement of 2015. Continuous UN climate summits in the COP series signify a commitment to global cooperation. Worldwide, nations are prioritizing carbon emission reduction, addressing greenhouse gas emissions, and promoting renewable energy. The CoP 28 initiative to establish an environmental loss and damage fund is crucial for countries vulnerable to environmental impacts. This cooperative effort extends beyond governmental boundaries, involving active participation from international organizations, businesses, and civil society in sustainability, conservation, and green technology initiatives. Together, these combined efforts lay the groundwork for a more sustainable and resilient future, ensuring the well-being of the global population.

Climate change and Population dynamics: The connection between climate change and population dynamics is intricate and multifaceted. A growing global population increases resource and energy demand, placing additional environmental stress. Vulnerable populations bear the brunt of climate change impacts, exacerbating social inequalities. Addressing these challenges requires sustainable development and population policies that integrate environmental and social considerations. Achieving a resilient and equitable future amid climate change necessitates balancing population dynamics with sustainable practices. The profound implications of climate change on both human societies and the natural environment directly impact lives, livelihoods, and overall well-being. Human populations are on the frontline of these climatic changes, influencing
