

A Great House and a Great Kiva

In front of you stands an excavated great house constructed in the mid-1000s common era (CE) and occupied until around 1150 CE. Its builders crafted rectangular rooms with wide masonry walls that supported a building that stood at least two stories tall. Villagers added a kiva on the west side of the great house, perhaps to accommodate an particular family or to facilitate the rituals of one or more important groups in the community.

After falling out of use for a few generations, a small group of people moved back into the site around 1215 CE. They built a kiva in one of the rooms on the east side of the great house. These occupants stayed only a few years at most before moving on.

Villagers likely built the great kiva at about the same time as the great house. Like the kivas in modern-day pueblos, great kivas were probably gathering places for community leaders and decision-makers. This great kiva at the Edge of the Cedars remains unexcavated. Out of respect to Pueblo descendants, the great kiva will remain undisturbed.

Kiva Mix-Up

Many people have mistakenly called the great kiva "kiva" to describe individual subterranean family spaces. These people use the word "kiva" to refer to their community rooms. Other people have mistakenly used that word to refer to special gathering places.

Great Kiva: 75 people could comfortably sit on the outer rim of the perimeter of the room. The space could be filled with many more people during social and ceremonial events.
