The Call of the North Stewart Edward White, 2005-03 Virginia did not sleep at all that night She was reaching toward her new self Heretofore she had ruled those about her proudly secure in her power and influence Now she saw that all along her influence had in not one jot exceeded that of the winsome girl She had no real power at all They went mercilessly on in the grim way of their fathers dealing justice even handed according to their own crude conceptions of it without thought of God or man She turned hot all over as she saw herself in this new light as she saw those about her indulgently smiling at her airs of the mistress of it It angered her though the smile might be good humored even affectionate
