Patel, 2021 Prematurity is a worldwide problem Every year 15 million babies are born prematurely and 1 million of those babies die because of related complications The surviving premature babies are struggling to hold on to their lives and even when they do live most of them end up having various complications to survive and get stronger There are physical complications faced on their journey such as having underdeveloped lungs pneumonia obesity sepsis retinopathy of prematurity respiratory distress syndrome RDS bronchopulmonary dysplasia BPD cerebral palsy and motor impairment They can also develop mental and behavioral health complications such as depression seizures developmental delay schizophrenia autism spectrum disorder psychological development disorders behavioral problems attention problems and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder ADHD later in life The purpose of this systemic review is to understand the impact of long term complications of premature birth on the individual life and society We hypothesized that based on data from primary research nearly one half of the infants will have either physical and or cognitive developmental health complications We hypothesized that infants born premature have more physical complications than cognitive complications or infants born premature have more cognitive complications than physical complications This research was carried out by finding cohort design studies through Medline Academic Search Premier and APA PsychINFO where the studies were compiled from 2003 2020 It was concluded from this research that there were more cognitive complications than physical complications with the majority being behavioral problems
