Abstract: Theory and economic intuition suggest that domestic institutions influence the employment impact of economic reform, but the evidence base is thin. This paper seeks to address this by examining the extent to which differences in regional labour market flexibility shaped the impact of unanticipated economic reforms on employment in informal (unregistered) manufacturing enterprises in India (1990–2001). It employs a difference-in-differences strategy and finds that tariff reductions are not associated with significant employment shifts in informal enterprises, a finding that may be attributable to the fact that these enterprises rarely engage in international trade. However, on average and ceteris paribus, delicensing (FDI reform) is associated with statistically significant increases (increases) in informal employment and informal enterprise numbers in inflexible (flexible) labour markets. There is some evidence that the delicensing effect is attributable to increases in product market competition in delicensed industries. However, the channel underlying the result associated with FDI reform is less clear. In light of the persistent primacy of the informal sector in India and other developing economies, these findings have substantial policy relevance.

1. Introduction

In the latter half of the twentieth century, several developing economies initiated comprehensive economic reform policies. A balance-of-payments crisis necessitating IMF assistance, preceded by a period of tepid growth and a growing realisation that the status quo was unsustainable, was the trigger for economic liberalisation in India in 1991. The Indian government implemented a series of far reaching economic reforms in the 1991–1997 period. The labour market impacts of these reforms remain somewhat poorly studied. Several studies, Nunn and Trefler (2014) and Ahsan (2013) being among the more recent, have documented that this impact is likely to be influenced by domestic institutions. However, this view has received scant attention in the Indian context, in particular at a ‘micro’ or firm level. Existing research also largely avoids the issue of economic duality that is typical of India and other developing economies. Put differently, the literature rarely distinguishes between registered, or formal, manufacturing firms and unregistered, or informal, manufacturers which, under Indian regulation, are manufacturing enterprises employing fewer than ten (twenty) workers and using (not using) electricity.

Estimated to account for 99 percent of businesses and approximately 80 percent of employment in the Indian manufacturing sector (Ghani et al. 2013a), economic outcomes in the informal sector merit as much academic and policy interest as those in the formal sector. More generally, the informal sector has long been an area of interest for development economists, since Hart’s (1973) seminal study of informal enterprises. Charnes (1998) documented that even as late as in 1998, informal enterprises
