The Potato Child & Others Lucia Prudence Hall Woodbury, 2017-06-22 The Potato Child It was certain that Elsie had a very hard and solitary life. When Miss Amanda had selected her from among the girls at The Home, the motherly matron felt sorry. She is a tender-hearted little thing and a kind word goes a great way with Elsie. Miss Amanda looked at the matron as if she were speaking Greek and said nothing. It was quite plain that few words, either kind or unkind, would pass Miss Amanda's lips. But The Home was more than full and Miss Amanda Armstrong was a person well known as the leading dressmaker in the city, a person of some money, not obliged to work now if she didn't wish to. If cold, she is at least perfectly just. They all said, "So Elsie went to work for Miss Amanda and lived in the kitchen. She waited on the door, washed the dishes, cleaned the vegetables, and set the table. Miss Amanda lived alone and ate in the kitchen. Every Friday she swept the house. Her bed was in a little room in the back attic. When she came, Miss Amanda handed her a dress and petticoat and a pair of shoes. These are to last six months," she said, and "see you keep yourself clean." She gave her also one change of stockings and underclothes. Here is your room; you do not need a light to go to bed by, and it is not healthy to sleep under too many covers. It wasn't so much what Miss Amanda did to her for she never struck her nor in any way ill-treated her, nor was it so much what she said for she said almost nothing. But she said it all in commands, and the loving little Elsie was just driven into herself. She had had a darling mother full of love and tenderness, and Elsie would say to herself, "I must not forget the things mama told me."

Love can never die and kind words can never die But she had no one to love and she never heard any kind words so she was a bit worried I shall forget how kind words sound and I shall forget how to love sighed the little girl She used to long for a doll or cat or something she could call her own and talk to She asked Miss Amanda who said No She added I have no money to give for such foolishness as a doll and a cat would eat its head off Miss Amanda had been blessed with no little girl time When she was young she always had been forced to work hard and she thought it was no worse for Elsie than it had been for herself I don't suppose it was but one looking in on these two could not but feel for both of them Elsie would try to talk to herself a little at night but it was cheerless Then she would lift up her knee and draw the sheet about it for a hood and call it a little girl She named it Nancy Pullam and would try to love that but it almost broke her back when she tried to hug Nancy Oh if I had something to be good to she said So she began greeting the ladies when she opened the door with a cheerful little Good morning or Good afternoon I wouldn't do that said Miss Amanda it looks forward and pert It is their place to say Good morning not yours
