

A black and white photograph of a person, likely a woman, wearing a headscarf and a patterned shawl, cooking with a woodstove. The stove is built into a wall, and several pots and pans are placed on its surface. Steam is rising from one of the pots. The background is slightly blurred, showing more of the kitchen area.

Mooney,2012-12-06 Our knowledge of the functional characteristics of the plants of mediterranean climate regions has increased greatly in the past decade In recent times the possibility of large scale utilization of biomass for energy from these regions has been proposed In order to assess the feasibility of these proposals we must consider the productive structure of these plant communities and how they vary through time and space This symposium was an attempt to examine our recently acquired basic knowledge of the environmental limitations on the productivity of Mediterranean plant communities in relation to the consequences of the possible utilization of these communities for energy and chemicals Specifically in this book we examine the mechanisms by which plants of mediterranean climate regions maintain their productive capacity under the prevailing conditions of summer draught and winter cold We consider the characteristics of leaves their history morphology and plasticity Evergreen sclerophyll leaves are common to the dominant plants of all mediterranean climate regions and thus they have significance in terms of enhancing carbon gain and water use efficiency as well as ensuring survival under the prevailing climatic conditions
