

Saying the unsayable: identities in crisis in the early novels of Marie Darrieussecq

Introduction

When Marie Darrieussecq's first novel Truismes exploded on to the French literary scene it was clear that she was a young writer intent on taking the reader to disturbing places.¹ Set in a partially recognisable, dystopic France of the near future, this erotic, funny and inventive novel satirises right-wing extremism, repressive state mechanisms, new-age fanaticisms and political correctness gone mad. Its primary focus on gender and body politics is provocatively inflected by Darrieussecq's choice of narrator – a young woman who metamorphoses into a sow – and the novel reveals the author's penchant for probing the frontiers between the everyday and the fantastic, the mimetic and the marvellous. Truismes launched the single-minded fascination with identity crises and altered states which would be confirmed by the subsequent novels, Naissance des fantômes and Le Mal de mer and it gave the French publishing world its phenomenon for the beginning of the 1996 literary year.²

In contrast to this pyrotechnic succès de scandale, Darrieussecq's next two novels were more sober, more literary and more tightly focused. Naissance des fantômes is an introspective, sometimes hallucinatory study of loss which is minimalist in terms of character range and plot. It is another series of confidences from a young first-person narrator who feels she is losing touch with reality, but rather than charting beastly transformations and innumerable adventures it simply catalogues her attempts to define herself through the empty spaces left after the sudden and inexplicable disappearance of her husband. Expanding on the theme of separation Le Mal de mer follows a young mother as she embarks abruptly on an ill-defined
