EDITOR'S INTRODUCTION

THERE are few people in whose society I have had greater pleasure than that of old Dr. Meredith, who was well known at a little place called Halsehead-on-Sea, which, with the adjacent town of Blackquay, was much frequented at one time by invalids. He had lived through the greater part of the present century and I thought it a privilege to be brought into close contact with him in his declining years. He was genial and kind-hearted, sometimes a little hot-tempered, quietly humorous and other times, occasionally whimsical in some of his ideas, and as some of his comrades said, a trifle superstitious. His education had not been exclusively technical to the detriment of the intellectual, neither had his training deadened his sensibilities so as to allow them to become obtuse. Though outspoken in his manner (his enemies again said sometimes roughness), he was a man of some culture, with a dread of vulgar utilitarianism, and an enthusiast for a profession which he held in higher esteem than mere earthly honours or profit. He was generally reticent about the people he had known, but by degrees it came out that he was familiar with many of the corners of human nature. One day he spoke to me of the strange experiences with which he had come in contact, and the secrets which had been entrusted to him by men and women who had passed into the "silent land."

"No one could be hurt if you told me a few of those stories. You say that the actors are dead, and the names of so many of them clean forgotten. Of course, in any case, you will tell me the real names, or anything that could make me, a little stranger to the place, guess the reality of the people or their near relations. But you could easily alter all that, and relate a few of your experiences. It is these experiences of real life which one values. Could you not tell me a little all that, if I brought pen and paper, and tried to take down your words?" I asked, coaxingly, one day.
