

Give Back

The people and organizations around you—your community—have contributed to your development. A great way to show your gratitude for this investment (and a good way to feel fulfilled in life) is to give back to your community.

Identify Your Strengths

Every person is different and unique. You have distinct likes, passions, and talents. Make use of these interests when considering how best to give back to the people and places around you. First, though, get comfortable identifying your strongest qualities.

You probably have other strengths in addition to these five, even if you are not aware of them. We often are not the best judges of our own strengths and can benefit from outside perspectives. Share lists with a classmate you know well and trade feedback on each other's listed strengths.

How would you adjust your list of top five strengths based on your conversation?

Identify Your Communities

You are part of several different communities: your home environment, your classmates and school community, and social, religious, or athletic groups as well. Every community has its needs—some great and some small, some that affect you and some that do not. Your unique strengths will combine with everyone else's to reach solutions to the problems your communities face.
