ABSTRACT

This research inquired into the constraints making up the dimensions of the United Nations (UN) Global Compact, explored the challenges and opportunities associated with collaborative forecasting. This direction was motivated by the fact that social sustainability, has received minimal attention in the literature. This study determined the constraints that are critical to creating sustainable supply chains. A three-phase Delphi approach involving qualitative and quantitative analysis was carried out. Feedback was obtained from 18 international experts who are very knowledgeable about collaboration and sustainable supply chains. Initially, 34 independent constraints that can be regarded as sub-dimensions of the dimensions making up the UN Global Compact were identified. However, sub-questions directed at all opportunities and challenges that are encountered at both corporate and supply chain levels yielded 38 constraints. Finally, eight key constraints were identified as highly critical to supply chain sustainability. No study has directly extracted the sub-dimensions of the UN Global Compact dimensions, and most research focused on economic and environmental sustainability while neglecting social sustainability. The current work is an attempt to address these gaps. Additionally, the research directed attention to the neglected relationship between collaborative forecasting and supply chain sustainability.

1. Introduction

Human activities are directed toward the accomplishment of economic targets, while environmental and social policies, such as those regulating natural contamination, human rights abuses, labor abuses, and corruption, are ineffectively implemented. These problems are expected to cause a wide range of social challenges, including those related to worker health and safety and child labor, as well as a variety of environmental problems, such as global warming and scarcity in natural resources. Consequently, even economic growth will be endangered in the long term (Ghadimi et al., 2011; Ahmed et al., 2011; Shoukohyar et al., 2020). This reality prompted many scientists, governments, and international organizations to find effective solutions and develop robust strategies for overcoming the aforementioned issues. These attempts gave rise to discussions about the concept of sustainable development, which involves the organization and control of human activities to realize economic goals, achieve social objectives, and sustain the capability of the environment to provide the natural resources on which economies and societies depend in the future (Hak et al., 2016). In this respect, in 1987, the World Commission on Environment and Development (WCED) introduced the primary concept of sustainability and years later Brington (1994) brought up the conception of “people, planet, and profits,” as dimensions and cornerstones of sustainable development. Nowadays, the United Nations (UN) Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), which is a comprehensive collection of 17 independent and broad goals included in the 2030 Agenda for sustainable development (UN Sustainable Development Summit, 2015) (Fig. 1). The UN has strongly encouraged businesses to commit to these goals, establish company policies on the basis of sustainability regulations, and report on their contributions to UN agencies. These directives make up a framework called The UN Global Compact (Grewer et al., 2016).

Nowadays, competition no longer occurs among companies but between supply chains. A supply chain is complicated in essence, involving various workflows across trading partners (Wu et al., 2013). Promoting supply chain performance necessitates acquiring accurate and timely information from different sources and restricting access to a collective. That is, no single individual company shall be granted access to all the information contained within a supply chain, such as data on market changes, retailers' orders, customer behaviors and demands, and many other types of information that are critical to strategic decision making. Especially determining customer satisfaction criteria is
