process, which can be accomplished by the use of large and small groups and classroom discussions. Lastly the material must be made real for the learner so that the learning is internalized. This can be accomplished through writing exercises, personal exploration, value clarification, and risk-taking that is involved as case studies are examined.

This book was developed with the perspective that experiential learning provides much experiences that have tremendous value in applying leadership and management theory. Throughout this text the authors have included numerous opportunities for readers to experience the real world of leadership and management. Some of these learning situations, which are called learning exercises, include case studies, writing exercises, specific management or leadership problems, staffing and budgeting calculations, group discussion or problem solving, and assessment of personal attitudes and values. Some exercises include opinions, speculation, and value judgments. Since almost all the learning exercises require critical thinking, problem solving, or decision making to some degree, the remainder of this chapter will focus on providing a theoretical foundation for leadership and management problem solving.
