

The Conquest of Mexico and The Conquest of Peru

Here again, copyists provided him with reams of archives from the Spanish bureau for the Indies and other depositories. Prescott was of course doing much more than simply gathering data. He was developing the empathy—both resonant and active—with his period and people. Dilthey termed this Verstehen, the necessary prelude to description and causal explanation. Although he never visited Mexico, in The Conquest Prescott drew on first-hand knowledge of similar terrain and climate in the Azores to inform his appreciation of Cortez's March. Those who knew Mexico swore he had been there! Any historian worthy of the name gathers his data not merely as an end in itself but as an important means to penetrate the ways of being and thinking of the period and place being investigated. This involves knowing at least something of its art, architecture, literature, politics, religion, popular culture, intellectual traditions, social and economic structure, and physical environment. If it is a foreign culture, it may entail moving for awhile through the actual geographic ambience where the events occurred. For example, the American historian of German Romantic psychiatry could profit from time in the better-preserved towns, villages, and institutions where his subjects lived and worked. The Freud scholar could visit Vienna; read his (published and still-unpublished) letters; pore over published volumes of photographs of Freud, his family, and domiciles; sit in his London study and consulting room; and examine his library and antiquities. All is fair game in the facilitation of empathy and informed historical imagination. In such work, the clinician-historian's training and practice in clinical assessment and psychotherapy should prove invaluable.

With a good knowledge of the general history of civilization and the background of the period, the historical apprentice is ready to begin work. With the consultation of mentors, he reads the best secondary literature on 1. Historiography: Medicine and Psychiatry 33 the topic; builds a working bibliography of primary and secondary sources; engages in the relevant archival work—letters, diaries, newspapers, journals, official reports, asylum casebooks, laboratory notebooks, and so on. Langlois and Seignebos dubbed this data-gathering phase “heuristic” (i.e., “discovery”), and sharply demarcated it from external criticism, internal criticism, and the hypothesizing and synthesis that follow.¹³² Elton, as well, deemed “Knowledge of all the sources, and competent criticism of them” as the prerequisites to reliable history-writing. The safeguard against procrusteanism lies in the “total survey of the material”
