Introduction

Since 1979, a central feature of the Conservative Government's approach to local authority service provision has been the introduction of competition. This policy was formalised through compulsory competitive tendering (CCT) introduced in 1980: mandatory legislation requiring councils to subject defined activities traditionally supplied in-house to periodic rivalry from external organisations. From the outset, CCT has generated a politicised debate and the major political parties remain fundamentally divided: the Labour Party is committed to its abolition (Labour Party, 1992); the Conservative Government to its extension to a wider range of municipal services (Treasury, 1991).

This article evaluates the economic performance of CCT. The first section sets out the evolution and political background to existing and planned legislation. The second section evaluates the various claims and counter-claims in the CCT debate. The third section, introducing new survey data, critically assesses the empirical evidence on competitive tendering as a procurement strategy for municipal refuse collection services. The final section presents the primary conclusions, and raises wider policy issues surrounding CCT for municipal services.

Policy Background

Local authorities have always relied on private and voluntary organisations to provide goods and services. Before 1979, however, the majority of authorities"
