

PSYCHOTHERAPY<sup>1,2</sup>

BY JULIUS SEEMAN

Department of Psychology, George Peabody College, Nashville, Tennessee

The definitive study in psychotherapy was not done this year. It may not be done in any year. But there was research in psychotherapy, and some of it was quite good. This is no longer cause for wonder or self-congratulation. There was a time, not long ago, when research in psychotherapy (any research) was greeted with paternal pats usually accorded to youthful precocity. Now research in therapy is getting on, and it will have to stand on its own merits rather than on its former status as the bright young child of psychology. This it gives every sign of doing.

If this was not the year of the definitive study, it was the year when experimental psychotherapy came into its own. There is a post hoc quality to this level of description—that is, the therapeutic process is reinterpreted or explained in learning terms, but the original therapeutic interaction goes on in the psychodynamic context. An illustration of this level might be the learning reinterpretation of psychoanalytic therapy. Such a reinterpretation can be quite useful as explanation. It may be more limited in its direct feedback to therapy practice.

The second level of discourse is that in which the therapeutic procedure begins from a learning context in the first place, a context in which the therapist acts upon a set of hypotheses cast from the beginning in learning terms. One of the more provocative efforts of this kind during the current year is Pascal's book (80). This treatise is thoroughly imbedded in the behavioristic tradition—so much so that Pascal has no need for clinical terms like patient or therapist, but prefers to think in terms of experi-
