

Classroom Strategies: Build Equity into SEL Efforts

Learn about families. Talk with or collect surveys from families. Ask about family composition, language, values, traditions, and concerns to help you understand and connect with families and students on a more personal level and build on students' competencies.

Engage families in SEL. Engage families in understanding the purpose of SEL and how it supports academic learning. Involve families in generating SEL goals for their children so that they can help their children meet these goals outside of the classroom.

Affirm diverse backgrounds and traditions. Have students share and listen to others' experiences and values. This builds empathy and affirms the strengths of diversity in the classroom.

Use effective discipline practices. Reduce and prevent the use of exclusionary discipline in your classroom. Teach students skills that help them take responsibility for their actions and manage their behavior in alignment with your SEL program.

Don't forget your own social and emotional assets and needs. Educators can experience stress from supporting students' social and emotional needs, managing behavior, and navigating student trauma. Regularly reflect on how you can leverage your assets to support SEL in your classroom and seek guidance and support from peers as needs arise.
