

Theology in the Americas. Edited by Sergio Torres and John Eagleson. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1976. xxviii + 438 pages. $12.95 (paper $5.95).

Theology in the Americas is a book about a process. The process is what happened before and during the Detroit Conference (August, 1975). Its original purpose, reflected in part one, was to bring together theologians from North and South America. It quickly became an exercise of doing theology rather than talking about it. Some of what the book contains is significant, some repetitious, some reflects deep suffering, some anger, but all of it is interesting.

The book is divided into three unequal sections: the preparation, the conference and reflections upon it. The preparatory papers and commentaries constitute over half the book. The conference itself is represented by short statements of various theologians and minority groups. Three long liberationist sociological interpretations of the situation in the United States are the only exceptions to these brief statements. Part Three is a fine essay by Gregory Baum and a short proposal entitled "The Contextualization of North American Theology," by a committee organized to coordinate the follow-up to the conference.

If I had to choose five significant presentations out of the forty-three in the book they would be Gregory Baum's excellent summary, "The Christian Left at Detroit," the initial preparation document reflecting the South American view of the Yankee Empire, P. E. Berryman's concise summaries of Latin American Theology, John A. Coleman's "Civil Religion and Liberation Theology in North America," and H. O. Edward's "Black Theology and Liberation Theology." The book itself is a "sampler" of liberation theologies and theologians. These five essays are representative of the best statements in the book.

A lot happened in Detroit. It is only hinted at in the analytical style of the text. The South American experience, articulated by its theologians, came face-to-face with the American minority experience found among the blacks, Chicanos, Native Americans, Appalachians, women, and Asian-Americans. The professional theologians from North and South America were influenced by the minority caucuses. The profound effect of these groups and their articulated experiences is seen throughout the book. The printed word is a difficult medium in which to express the struggles of theology in the process of liberation.

Two major themes are in tension throughout the text: South American liberation theology and the attempt to find the proper hermeneutic to explain the role of dominance and liberation in the United States. The conference did resolve one thing. It rejected any attempt to apply liberation theology as found in South America to the North. It called for a continued attempt from the theologians of the North to recognize the context of their theology.

This book should be found in every library as an historical record of a significant event in American theology, even if many of the professional theologians among us were not there. We must be clear that in the many references to "American" theology or North American theology the authors for the most part are referring to the United States. There is little recognition of the Canadian situation except from Gregory Baum and, of course, none toward the Mexican situation. There was much provincialism in the early preparations for the conference.

I do not think the book has much place in the classroom except as a source book for summaries of liberation theology and examples of how one goes about
