School and Classroom Effects on Student Learning Gain Marlaine E. Lockheed, 1987 This paper employs a fixed effects regression analysis to examine school effects on individual student learning gain during grade eight in 99 lower secondary schools in Thailand Schools accounted for 34% of the variance in individual student pretest scores but accounted for only 6% of the variance in student achievement gain post test controlling for pretest A set of school classroom and teacher variables accounted for 4% of the 6% School factors accounted for approximately 7% of the variance in both rural and urban schools suggesting that schools are equally important in both settings In both urban and rural schools larger schools and an enriched curriculum were positively associated with learning gain and higher student teacher ratios at the school level were negatively associated with learning gain Other factors however operated differently in the two types of schools An important policy implication is that strategies for improving rural schools should not be derived from research conducted primarily in urban schools in developing countries
