Abstract: At the beginning of the 21st century, the European Union, in response to the wave of globalisation and the challenges of a knowledge-based economy, has vigorously promoted a lifelong learning strategy in the field of education and training, and has proposed key competence. The importance of intercultural communication has become increasingly evident in the process of globalization. English language teaching plays an important role in facilitating students' intercultural communication skills. In English classroom teaching, we should not only attach significance to the language knowledge, but also integrate cultural concepts into English teaching and learning, so that students can perceive and experience the differences between Chinese and Western cultural practices. Situational teaching method is a lively and interesting method that integrates knowledge with context and can provide methodological guidance and implications for the cultivation of intercultural communication competence of high school students. This paper attempts to combine situational teaching method and intercultural communication skills development, and to investigate the effect of situational teaching method on the development of intercultural communication skills of high school students, so as to provide an effective method for the development of intercultural communication competence of high school students.

Keywords: Intercultural communication competence, Situational teaching, Core competence, English teaching in senior high school.

1. Introduction

For half a century, the concept of intercultural (communicative) competence has been studied widely in different fields where interacting with other cultures is a central concern. Intercultural communication competence encompasses attitudes, knowledge and skills at the interface between several cultural areas, including the students' own values and worldviews and those of a target language country[1]. Intercultural communication and exchange, international cooperation and communication require people to express themselves effectively through languages. Intercultural communication competence (ICC), although variously interpreted by different theorists, is characterized by an underlying assumption that it helps to understand and overcome cultural discrepancies[2]. With so many opportunities the EU gives its citizens, the ability to communicate effectively in a common language seems of paramount importance. In the age of economic globalization and information technology, the ability to use English effectively and communicate with people from different cultures is a fundamental quality for citizens. While the goal of English language teaching has undergone changes from imitating "native speakers" to becoming an intercultural communicator, pedagogical implementations have not been fully realized in classrooms, especially the ones that enable students to communicate globally while at the same time help them maintaining their native/traditional languages and cultures[3].

In most schools, however, some teachers are still using the traditional indoctrination mode of teaching in a modern teaching environment, which is teacher-centred teaching. Rigid teaching can't make students fully understand the history, customs, religious culture and cultural background of countries where English is their mother tongue. The cultivation of intercultural communication ability can't be achieved simply by rote memorization, but needs to be infiltrated into the practice and expression of different contexts through the explanation of knowledge in the process of English application. The lack of real-life situations and contexts for intercultural learning is a major difficulty to the development of intercultural communication skills. As an practical teaching method, situational teaching method has attracted some middle school teachers' attention for mobilizing students' classroom initiative and developing students' core competence. Teachers should guide students to pay attention to cultural factors in the process of language use, and to gradually increase their awareness of the differences between Chinese and foreign cultures. Besides, teachers should create as realistic a context for intercultural communication according to the level of Chinese language development of different learners and students' cognitive abilities and real-life experiences, so as to help students learn in the process of experiencing the intercultural communication environment. Within the basic framework of core competence in English, helping students to develop good cultural awareness is conducive to expand and complement the theory of core competence in the subject of cultural awareness.
