Patient: Female, 41-year-old
Final Diagnosis: Endometriosis + hemorrhage + pregnancy
Symptoms: Abdominal pain
Clinical Procedures: —
Specialty: Obstetrics and Gynecology

Objective: Unusual clinical course
Background: Spontaneous hemoperitoneum in pregnancy (SHIP), defined as nontraumatic, acute intra-abdominal bleeding during pregnancy or the postpartum period, is a serious life-threatening complication to mother and child. Endometriosis is a major risk factor for SHIP. This study presents the case of a 41-year-old woman with adenomyosis who developed hemoperitoneum due to endometriosis at 28 weeks of pregnancy.

Case Report: The patient was a 41-year-old woman (gravida 1, para 0) who conceived via artificial insemination. She had diffuse adenomyosis in the posterior uterine wall and was admitted to our hospital at 12 weeks of gestation with persistent lower abdominal pain. She had started treatment with hydroxyprogesterone caproate to reduce the focal inflammation of adenomyosis. At 28 weeks of gestation, she developed severe lower abdominal pain, and ultrasonography revealed prolonged fetal heart rate deceleration. An emergency cesarean delivery was performed, and a 907 g female infant with an Apgar score of 2/3 was delivered. Umbilical artery blood pH was 7.15. Bleeding from the veins surrounding an endometriotic lesion on the posterior wall of the uterus was observed, and SHIP was diagnosed.

Conclusions: Pregnancies complicated by endometriosis or adenomyosis require perinatal management, considering the possibility of SHIP complication. If acute abdominal pain and fetal heart rate deceleration occur during pregnancy, a search for intra-abdominal bleeding should be performed and emergent open hemostasis or cesarean delivery should be considered.

Blood Flow Dynamics in Burns Robin Mirdell,2019-11-25 Objectives Burns of intermediate thickness are hard to evaluate clinically This often leads to unnecessary delays of up to 14 days before a surgical decision can be made To counter this several objective methods have been developed to determine the healing potential of the wound Over the years measurement of perfusion has proven to be the most successful method for evaluation of healing potential Laser Doppler imaging LDI is currently the most used method and can determine surgical need 2 days after injury with an accuracy 90% There are however emerging techniques like laser speckle contrast imaging LSCI which also measure perfusion LSCI have several advantages over LDI and is easier to use LSCI can also investigate aspects of the microcirculation previously not possible with LDI The aim of this thesis was to investigate LSCI s ability to evaluate surgical need in burns of indeterminate partial thickness The first objective was to investigate the dynamics of perfusion the first 14 days after injury The purpose was to find the optimal time window for perfusion measurements The next goal was to determine the accuracy of different perfusion cut offs In this second study the benefit of a subsequent measurement was also investigated After this interobserver variation between different profession groups was studied Both the agreement of perfusion measurements and observer assessments were evaluated Finally cardiac vasomotion in combination with perfusion pulsatility was investigated as a method to determine surgical need
