

Dobrin's concern for the way writers treat their readers also plays a large part in his objections to the technologization of writing. If writing is simply a means by which the writer achieves some organizational or individual ends, the reader, too, is merely a means toward those ends: The writer is using his or her writing to put the other person—the reader—"at the writer's disposal" (34).

Dobrin's conviction that every communication act has a personal and moral dimension sharply distinguishes his treatment of business and technical writing from almost all other such treatments, including those that also draw upon speech act theory. Sound, sensible theories are needed to support our teaching and research. But even more, we need to learn how to remember that writing involves real people who deserve our solicitude and respect. These individuals have been largely banished from our scholarly articles and our textbooks—which are populated primarily by such cardboard figures as the expert, the technician, the customer, and the executive. We will inevitably teach, research, and theorize more satisfactorily if we remember that each reader is a person with particular feelings, concerns, abilities, and needs—a person to whom the writer has not only pragmatic responsibilities but also social and moral responsibilities.

In the last decade or so, we've seen a flurry of activity from those who used to be content to teach service courses in writing to students in engineering and other technical fields. Technical writing started calling itself technical communication or sometimes professional communication, which includes scientific and business communication. Composition people got involved by discovering writing in nonacademic settings; and institutions got involved by setting up majors, minors, certificate programs, and graduate degrees. Several new journals, including JBTC, were launched. Many departments are trying to hire the few doctoral students with research specialties in professional communication who prefer not to take more lucrative positions in industry.

Meanwhile, faculty, graduate students, and industrial-communication specialists are engaged in research on problems and issues that seem to lie within the area called technical communication. Courses introduce students to the results and methods of previous research and to activities that are understood to be those of actual professional communicators. Many researchers claim that technical communication has become a discipline, and they cite all these re-

Foundations for Teaching Technical

Communication Katherine Staples, Cezar M. Ornatowski, 1997-12-31 This is designed to be a seminal textbook for researchers and teachers of scientific and technical communication. It draws together contributions from scholars in the field covering the three broad themes of theory, practice and program design while focusing on topics of contemporary concern. These include insights into the relevance of cognitive psychology for technical communication, ethics and multicultural issues, impact of new technologies, visual communication, design of teaching and research programmes and quality and evaluation.

Plain Language and Ethical Action Russell Willerton, 2015-05-22 Plain Language and Ethical Action examines and evaluates principles and practices of plain language that technical content producers can apply to meet their audiences' needs in an ethical way. Applying the BUROC framework (Bureaucratic, Unfamiliar, Rights Oriented and Critical) to identify situations in which audiences will benefit from plain language, this work offers in-depth profiles showing how six organizations produce effective plain language content. The profiles show plain language projects done by organizations ranging from grassroots volunteers on a shoe-string budget to small nonprofits to consultants completing significant federal contracts. End of chapter questions and exercises provide tools for students and practitioners to reflect on and apply insights from the book. Reflecting global commitments to plain language, this volume includes a case study of a European group based in Sweden along with results from interviews with plain language experts around the world including Canada, England, South Africa, Portugal, Australia and New Zealand. This work is intended for use in courses in information design, technical and professional communication, health communication and other areas producing plain language communication. It is also a crucial resource for practitioners developing plain language technical content and content strategists in a variety of fields including health literacy, technical communication and information design.

The Psychology Research Handbook Frederick T. L. Leong, James T. Austin, 2023-11-16 In the Third Edition of The Psychology Research Handbook, editors Frederick T. L. Leong and James T. Austin have assembled experienced expert researchers to provide graduate students and research assistants with a comprehensive framework for conducting many types of psychology research. The book is organized around the idea of a research script following the step-by-step process of research planning, design, data collection, analysis and disseminating research. Many chapters are coauthored by advanced graduate students to give their fellow students a sense of real-world research, adding to the clarity and practicality of many chapters. Students and instructors alike will appreciate chapters on topics typically missing from introductory methods texts, including applying for research grants, dealing with journal editors and reviewers, working within research teams and conducting cross-cultural research. Structures such as recommended readings and exercises guide students to develop and expand their research skills. New chapters include Power and Evidence, IRB as Critical Collaborators in Research, Alternative Data Collection Strategies, Structural Equation Modeling and Replicability and Reproducibility. A comprehensive, easy-to-understand guide to the entire research process, this book quickly and efficiently equips advanced students and research assistants to conduct a full research project.
