According to rational-choice theory, popular support for various political parties can be explained sufficiently in terms of deliberate decisions by individual voters to support the party whose policies they believe will yield them the greatest economic advantage. This theory is opposed by many sociologists on the grounds that a complex phenomenon such as the rise of a political organization cannot be caused by a simple phenomenon.

23. It can be properly inferred from the statements above that many sociologists believe that

- (A) economically motivated decisions by voters need not constitute a complex phenomenon
- (B) a complex phenomenon generally will have many complex causes
- (C) political phenomena often have religious and cultural causes as well as economic ones
- (D) popular support for political parties is never a complex phenomenon
- (E) the decisions of individual voters are not usually influenced by their beliefs about which policies will yield them the greatest economic advantage
