The Agrarian Question In Kenya:

The Agrarian Question in Kenya Stephen Walter Orvis, 1997 Tackles central questions in the literature on African agrarian social structure and rural development Remarkably broad in scope rich in conceptual and theoretical content and it speaks directly to development policy Few volumes attempt so much and fewer yet do it as well Frank W Holmquist Hampshire College Amherst Provides new insights into debates about agricultural development in Africa through combining a historical and comparative perspective with a detailed case study Reveals the relationship between inequality and agricultural productivity to be much more complex than the current wisdom assumes A compelling picture Victoria Bernal University of California Irvine Kenya has been a model of market based development for many years widely touted because of early and significant economic successes Recent slowing in the growth of agriculture however has meant slower growth overall Stephen Orvis argues that a shortage of labor at the household level especially women s labor explains this stagnation In this important study Orvis critiques structural adjustment and delineates the ways in which market forces have been largely responsible for Kenya s gradual shift toward a less agrarian society He also explores the ways in which market forces have spawned the development of social and political networks that have little interest in improving agricultural growth and he provides the first detailed account of rural participation in the multiparty electoral process Drawing on intensive field work in Kisii District a densely populated area in the tea and coffee zones of western Kenya he documents the evolution of more than 100 families over three generations and the last 50 years plumbing their current and historical economic strategies He uses the insights generated by this micro analytic exercise to reinterpret a number of other peasant studies done in Kenya and elsewhere As a result he is able to draw convincing implications from his work for a surprisingly large range of issues central to our understanding of Kenyan sociology rural development and politics of interest to Kenya and development scholars alike Stephen Orvis is associate professor of government at Hamilton College

Shivji, 2011-10-13 A compelling and critical destruction of both the English agricultural revolution and the theory of comparative advantage upon which unequal trade has been justified for three centuries this account argues that these ideas have been used to disguise the fact that the North from the time of colonialism to the present day has used the much greater agricultural productivity of the South to feed and improve the living standards of its own people while impoverishing the South At the same time the imposition of neoliberal reforms in the African continent has led to greater unemployment spiraling debt land and livestock losses reduced per capita food production and decreased nutrition Arguing that political stability hangs in the balance this book calls for labor intensive small scale production new thinking about which agricultural commodities are produced the redistribution of the means of food production and increased investment in rural development The combined effort of African and Indian scholarly work this account demands policies that defend the land rights of small producers and allow people to live with dignity The Agrarian Structure in Kenya Paulus Gerardus Maria Hebinck,1990
