

complex patterns demand to target all the factors for the effectiveness of treatment. Latest trend suggests that combination of stuttering therapy with other evidence based treatments is effective in maintaining cognitive and emotional change (Caughier & Dumasair, 2017; Schenck, Biedel & Vanyckeghem, 2019).

The psychotherapeutic component in speech management focuses on speakers' maladaptive thought patterns, feelings and behaviors associated with stuttering (Westbrook & Kirk, 2005). Substantial empirical evidences advocate the desirable outcome when cognitive approaches were combined the stuttering management (Brown, Millard & Zebrowski, 2014; Irani, Gabel, Daniels, & Hughes, 2012). Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT) is mindfulness based contextual cognitive behavior approach that addresses psychological flexibility (Towhid, 2012). It refers to the ability of contacting the present moment and inner experiences and leading to behavioral change consistent with valued based goals (Hayes, Luoma, Bond, Masuda & Lillis, 2006). The ACT model fosters the willingness to accept and experience the unhelpful feelings and defusing the self-defeating thoughts. Furthermore, ACT develops patterns of committed action based on values to spend rich and meaningful life while being mindful in present moment. Subsequently, psychological flexibility helps to adapt behavioral change and response to the distressing experiences. Researchers have shown that ACT is found promising in enhancing psychological flexibility toward stuttering by improving psychological functioning in terms of acceptance, defusion of negative thoughts, commitment to workable actions (Ansari, 2018). Moreover, researchers found effectiveness to improve psychosocial adjustment to stuttering and cognitive appraisal, emotional regulation and communication attitude toward stuttering (O'Neill, Dwyer & Varon, 2012; Kordell, 2013).

There was found a scarcity of an indigenous literature on combined speech and psychotherapeutic intervention to improve the impact of stuttering on speakers' communication, psychological reactions and quality of life. The success of a therapy is determined by the client's need that reflects the emotional maladjustment, and psychological complications associated with stuttered speech as well. Gutar (2018) emphasized that advanced stuttering is coupled with secondary symptoms of cognitive behavior and emotional reactions. Subsequently, stuttering appear in a vicious cycle and impair the psychosocial functioning. There is a need to develop tailor made therapy plan with inoculation of psychotherapeutic components and provide empirical evidence of the integrated therapy. The present study would provide evidence based efficacy of therapy integrated with Acceptance and commitment therapy specifically for the persons who stutter. ACT is aligned with stuttering modification as emphasis on acceptance by counter experiential avoidance. Stuttering alleviates in intensity, and speakers unacceptance of non-curable stuttering lead to adopt maladaptive speech and social avoidance. Stuttering modification goal is to develop acceptance of stuttering by replacing the avoidance behaviors with stuttering modification strategies (Hirshfeldt & Lorenz, 1999). The core component of psychological flexibility was employed to counter experiential avoidance of speech situations and build mindful-awareness and acceptance to experience the stuttering moment. Furthermore, psychological distancing from fusion thoughts, feelings and engaging in committed actions of speech techniques was targeted to break the emotional, behavioral and cognitive reactions.
