

Historical Sources, Evidence & Credibility

Think Like A Historian: What is credibility?

It is probably no secret every teacher thinks differently. Math teachers think in math terms – how to measure something, what are the angles forming the shape, how to multiply numbers quickly, etc. English teachers think about your writing – what words do you use, how is the grammar when speaking, what sentences make a good paragraph. Depending on the subject and the teacher, they all have different ways of thinking and teaching. In every subject, teachers learn to think like people who have the same interest as they do.

This should come as no surprise as everyone tends to adopt the language, methods, and ideas from the things they have an interest in. For example, if you have an interest in being a cheerleader, you learn from coaches what makes a cheerleader a good one. The same holds true for any sport or hobby someone chooses to be part of. As you practice, it is only natural that you begin to think like the coach, and you begin to have a more in-depth knowledge of what you are practicing.

Everyone has heard about the Scientific Method. The scientific method is the process scientists follow to conduct research, solve problems, and discover new things. Just like scientists, historians have a method they follow when trying to find out what happened in the past and why that is important now. Historical thinking is a set of skills for evaluating and analyzing primary and secondary source documents. The job of a historian is to construct a meaningful and accurate picture of a past event using the information they find. Like scientists, information that historians use must be accurate. Accurate to a historian means credible and verifiable. Historians use the best evidence they find to explain to readers the events as they happened. Generally, the sources historians use will fall into two categories – primary source and secondary source.

Type of Source	Definition and Examples
Primary	Primary sources are first-hand evidence about an event, object, person, or work of art. Some examples are historical and legal documents , eyewitness accounts, newspapers, journals, diaries, audio and video recordings, speeches, and art objects.
Secondary	Secondary sources are created later by someone who did not experience the first-hand experience. Examples are books and articles about the subject.
