The Industrial Organization of Chinese Government Yasheng Huang, 1998. Conventional analysis of government typically focuses on politics, i.e., interests, conflicts, or personalities. But governing a country is not only a task of successfully governing its people but also an administrative task of managing subordinate officials. This is a very relevant issue in a country such as China. In China, there are around forty ministries, thirty provincial governments, 2,400 county governments, and some 30,000 township governments. The entire political system employs over 10 million people. The top managers of the country, some thirty national leaders, not only make policies but also manage a large number of bureaucratic personnel. As in business organizations, control problems occur when subordinates have different interests from those of the organization and when the behavior of subordinates is imperfectly monitored. Control mechanisms are designed to minimize control problems by either aligning interests or improving information. This article uses this framework to explain a wide variety of administrative phenomena in Chinese government organizations. One implication of the findings is that the Chinese political system seems to be able to select the right people to the top levels of the government.
