

Photogeology

Photogeological research represents a systematic study of geological relationships by usage of photographs taken from the air.

Photogeology is used in all phases of the map production, depending how photogenic is the terrain.

In the preparatory phase on the basis of photogeology the main relationships in the study area can be assumed.

During the fieldwork geologists can check the assumptions shown in the initial photogeological map.

In the final production of the map photogeology serves to connect and complement the established geological relationships.
