Soviet Anthropological Study of Arctic Areas

Studies in Siberian Ethnogenesis. Anthropology of the North: Translations from Russian Sources, No. 2. H. N. Michael, Ed. Published for the Arctic Institute of North America. University of Toronto Press, Toronto, Canada, 1962. vi + 313 pp. Illus. Paper, $3.50.

Previous activities of the Arctic Institute of North America, a joint Canadian-American venture in the scientific study of the polar north, have been concentrated on the New World, chiefly for reasons of expediency. But a recent grant from the National Science Foundation has enabled the Institute to undertake a major program of translating Soviet publications concerned with anthropological research on the Arctic. Russian work, during both the Soviet and the pre-Soviet periods, is of great significance, in both quality and quantity. The Arctic is a unitary area, and it should be studied simultaneously from all sides. The institutions that have made the present series possible have contributed importantly to a program of balanced research into the area.

The present volume, on the ethnogenesis of contemporary Siberian peoples, was preceded by the Institute's translation of a volume by S. I. Rudenko, on the archeology of the Bering Sea area and the problem of Eskimo origins [reviewed in Science 134, 999 (1961)]. Anticipated future publications in the series will include M. G. Levin's Ethnic Anthropology, which is concerned with problems of ethnogenesis of eastern Siberia.

If the origins of historically reported peoples figure heavily in the series, it is because this reflects an important trend in Soviet research. The Rudenko volume marshaled evidence on Eskimo ethnogenesis from archeological investigation; the Levin volume discusses Gilyak, Manchu-Tungusic, Yakagir, Eskimo, Chukchi, Koryak Kamchadal, and Ainu origins from the viewpoint of comparative somatology. Although ethnogenesis figures importantly in Soviet writing, the Institute's translations will not deal only with this problem; the series will also include volumes on shamanism, archeology other than that of historically reported peoples, ethnology, and ethnohistory other than ethnogenesis.

The present volume contains translations of 17 articles, published during the 1950's by anthropologists in the Soviet Union, on questions of ethnogenesis of northern Eurasia. An attempt was made in selecting the articles to cover all parts of Siberia and neighboring parts of European Russia, but not every single ethnic group. The articles illustrate the use of a variety of methods and sources in approaches to the problem of ethnogenesis, which employ the evidence of ethnohistory; technology, art, and archeology; somatology; linguistics and philology; comparative social organization; and archival and folkloristic sources. The total scope of Soviet study can thus be seen. Moreover, ethnogenetic research, the results of which have in part been reflected in this volume, has been made the subject of a number of so-called complex expeditions—that is, fieldwork involving the collaboration of specialists from different subdisciplines of anthropology: archeology, human biology, folklore, linguistics, material culture.

The volume will undoubtedly be interesting to students of Eurasian anthropology, Arctic specialists, those who follow cultural relations of the Old and New worlds, students of comparative ethnology and the methods of culture history generally, and (more widely) to those who are curious about the current state of Soviet thought. The last consideration is not without importance, in view of the type of question often put to those with knowledge of the Russian language. Here, then, is a volume strong both in factual detail and in methodology. The editor, in the interests of scientific relevance, omitted certain passages of the original texts (the deletions are indicated in the translation); in these passages (at the beginnings of the articles), the authors took issue with the ethnological theories of N. Ya. Marr, a controversy of little interest outside the Soviet Union (or, for that matter, within the Soviet Union today), or they praised the ethnological theories of Stalin, of which the same may be said.

The first five articles deal with the ethnogenesis, historical development, and affiliation of the peoples of northwestern Yakutia. The discussion of the problem is sharp, and it is clear from the accompanying remarks that not only scientific issues but also a practical question are at stake: Do the territorial boundaries of Yakutia include the Olenok and Anabar river basins? The indigenous population is Yakut-speaking, but they may have spoken a Tungusic language before becoming Yakutized; also, a stereotyped notion of the Yakut as cattle-breeders and of Tungus as reindeer-breeders may have interfered with the identification of these peoples. According to recent maps, the territory of the Olenok and Anabar river basins has been retained by Yakutia, presumably on the basis of the anthropological data.

An equally lively debate on the origin of the Buryats of southern Siberia is undertaken by B. O. Dolgikh and S. A. Tokarev. The Buryats had no name in common at the time of Russian contact in the 17th century. Dolgikh argues that this absence of a common name is related to an absence of ethnic identity. Tokarev sees no connection between consciousness of a common name and consciousness of common kind. Dolgikh's mechanistic association of ethnonym and conscious ethnic unity is less tenable than Tokarev's view, namely that, in the light of available evidence, the unity of the Buryat people in connection with their origin as a people predates the period of Russian contact by three to four centuries. Despite his fate in this controversy, Dolgikh appears to be the outstanding student of the ethnogenesis of Siberian peoples, based on records, including archives. Two of his papers in this volume should be noted: his excellent contributions concerning the Yakutian question (previously mentioned) and his long article on the origin of the Nganasans, a Uralic-speaking people, Hunters and Gatherers in the Modern World Megan Biesele, Robert K. Hitchcock, Peter P. Schweitzer, 2000-04-01 In an age of heightened awareness of the threat that western industrialized societies pose to the environment, hunters and gatherers attract particularly strong interest because they occupy the ecological niches that are constantly eroded. Despite the denial of sovereignty, the world's more than 350 million indigenous peoples continue to assert aboriginal title to significant portions of the world's remaining biodiversity. As a result, conflicts between tribal peoples and nation states are on the increase. Today many of the societies that gave the field of anthropology its empirical foundations and unique global vision of a diverse and evolving humanity are being destroyed as a result of national economic, political and military policies. Although quite a sizable body of literature exists on the living conditions of the hunters and gatherers, this volume is unique in that it represents the first extensive east-west scholarly exchange in anthropology since the demise of the USSR. Moreover, it also offers new perspectives from indigenous communities and scholars in an exchange that can be termed south-north, as opposed to north-north, denoting the predominance of northern Europe and North America in scholarly debate. The main focus of this volume is on the internal dynamics and political strategies of hunting and gathering societies in areas of self-determination and self-representation. More specifically, it examines areas such as warfare and conflict resolution, resistance, identity and the state, demography and ecology, gender and representation and world view and religion. It raises a large number of major issues of common concerns and therefore makes important reading for all those interested in human rights issues, ethnic conflict, grassroots development and community organization and environmental topics.

Politics and Government in Germany, 1944-1994 C. C. Schweitzer, Detlev Karsten, Robert Spencer, 1995-07-30 This revised and enlarged edition brings the successful original volume of 1984 right up to date, taking into account the most recent developments. Each section begins with an introduction that provides the context for the following documents. There is no comparable volume of its kind available in English and most documents have not previously been translated.

Hunter-Gatherers in History, Archaeology and Anthropology Alan Barnard, 2020-05-26 The study of hunter-gatherers has had a profound impact on thinking about human nature and about the nature of society. The subject has especially influenced ideas on social evolution.
