Chapter Summary

The microbiome is a complex system of microorganisms that live in and on the human body. It is a dynamic system that can be influenced by various factors, including diet, environment, and medical interventions.

Systemic Relationships Between Microbes and Their Hosts (pp. 484-489)

Systemic relationships between microbes and their hosts can be categorized into three main types:

Types of Relationships

- Commensalism: A relationship in which one organism benefits from the presence of another organism, but the other organism is not affected.
- Mutualism: A relationship in which both organisms benefit from the presence of each other.
- Parasitism: A relationship in which one organism benefits from the presence of another organism, but the other organism is harmed.
- Symbiosis: A relationship in which two organisms live together, but the relationship is not necessarily beneficial to both.

Microbial Control Strategies

Microbial control strategies are designed to prevent or reduce the number of microorganisms in a population. These strategies can be categorized into three main types:

- Prevention: Strategies that aim to prevent the entry of microorganisms into the body.
- Treatment: Strategies that aim to reduce the number of microorganisms in the body.
- Control: Strategies that aim to control the growth and spread of microorganisms.
