continues to be a problem worth serious discussion as well as a problem in the understanding of modernism Philip Kuberski locates the central tension between Pound's poetry and his politics in the contrast between the poet's technical innovations his commitment to modernist writing and his antimodernist conception of reading and esthetics Few twentieth century poets Kuberski says have been as dedicated to a reconciliation of metaphysical values and the materiality of human languages Focusing on this juncture of form and meaning he asserts that Pound's work presents a dramatic perhaps tragic illustration of the costs involved in moving from a theocentric or logocentric understanding of art to a truly modern or postmodern understanding of it Kuberski also considers the ways in which Pound's career reflects an extreme version of tensions in American culture Both Pound's poetry and his fascism can be derived from elements of American Romanticism he claims citing Emerson's exposition of natural language Whitman's sense of the poet as Adamic Superman and Poe's exploration of nonalphabetic scripts In his title and his terminology Kuberski employs the metaphor of stones a calculating device to chart Pound's overt concerns with a stone like foundation for human knowledge for origin and for civilization
