fabulous wealth Many prospectors had left their bones to bleach white in the sun finally to be buried by the ever blowing sands Upon the occasion of Tappan's last escape from this desolate and forbidding desert he had promised Jenet never to undertake it again It seemed Tappan promised the faithful burro a good many things It had been a habit When Tappan had a particularly hard experience or perilous adventure he always took a dislike to the immediate country where it had befallen him Jenet had dragged him across Death Valley through incredible heat and the midnight furnace winds of that strange place and he had promised her he would never forget how she had saved his life Nor would he ever go back to Death Valley He made his way over the Funeral Mountains worked down through Nevada and crossed the Rio Colorado above Needles and entered Arizona He traveled leisurely but he kept going and headed southeast towards Globe There he cashed one of his six bags of gold and indulged in the luxury of a complete new outfit Even Jenet appreciated this fact for the old outfit would scarcely hold together Tappan had the other five bags of gold in his pack and after hours of hesitation he decided he would not cash them and entrust the money to a bank He would take care of them For him the value of this gold amounted to a small fortune Many plans suggested themselves to Tappan But in the end he grew weary of them What did he want with a ranch or cattle or an outfitting store or any of the businesses he now had the means to buy Towns soon palled on Tappan People did not long please him Selfish interest and greed seemed paramount everywhere Besides if he acquired a place to take up his time what would become of Jenet That question decided him He packed the burro and once more took to the trails
