

While enjoying the beauty of a spring day on campus, an academic dean prepares to make a presentation to the institution's Board of Trustees about the meaning and place of critical thinking in the curriculum. One after another the dean informally encounters faculty and staff colleagues, each of whom contributes an important bit of practical wisdom to the dean's deliberations about critical thinking. These brief conversations hit on all the key issues around critical thinking in higher education today.¹

Peter and Noreen Facione study human reasoning and decision-making. They have developed nationally and internationally used reasoning skills and mindset assessment instruments. The INSIGHT instruments are used by businesses, the health professions, the military, and government agencies to identify, hire and develop talent at the executive, professional, staff, and support personnel levels. The California Critical Thinking Skills Test, the California Critical Thinking Dispositions Inventory, the Health Sciences Reasoning Test, the Business Critical Thinking Skills Test, and the Test of Everyday Reasoning, CCTST-M25, and the Transfer and Re-Entry Admissions Assessment, among others, are used by educational institutions at all levels for research and for a variety of student assessment and admissions purposes. Peter is a co-author with Carol Gittern of THINK Critically, Pearson Education.

Talking Critical Thinking

By Peter A. Facione and Noreen C. Facione

Beneath the quad's purple canopy of jacaranda blossoms, the dean of the faculty sat hunched over her laptop trying to gather her thoughts for her afternoon presentation to the Board of Trustees.

The Coach – It Takes More Skills Only

As syncopated as a hip-hop beat, the approaching sound of a dribbling basketball invaded her consciousness. "What's the matter, your e-mail down?" asked the women's hoops coach, settling down beside her.

"No," replied the dean, "Just enjoying the day. The morning session with the trustees was, let's just say, challenging."
