

determination of sex. Plausible explanations are given for the advantage of environmental sex determination in the echiurid worm Bonellia and in mermithid nematodes that parasitize insects of different sizes. As the author acknowledges, the advantage of environmental sex determination in those turtles and crocodilians in which it is known is less clear.

While paths of equilibria may, with appropriate assumptions, connect many of the mechanisms of sex determination, the development of markedly heteromorphic sex chromosomes is a major deterrent to such shifts; in those reptile groups in which both features have been studied, environmentally determined sex is absent when heteromorphic sex chromosomes are present; the uniformity of male heterogamety in mammals and of female heterogamety in birds and the occurrence of XX/XO systems in large groups of insects, arachnids, and nematodes probably reflect the extreme sex chromosomal heteromorphism seen in those groups. Although empirical studies of the degeneration of one sex chromosome are difficult, an appropriate experimental model probably exists in the hemiclonally inherited genomes of hybridogenetic fishes (Poeciliopsis) and frogs (Rana esculenta).

The chapters on cytoplasmic sex determination, though interesting, are less convincing to me than others because the cytoplasmic factors are maternally transmitted microorganisms. Neither the assumption that infected females are as fit nor the apparent ascription of genetic fixity to the microorganisms themselves seems appropriate. I could not help wondering whether the great complexity of sex determination patterns seen in the isopod Armadillidium was not a result of genetic heterogeneity in the parasite as well as the host. Nevertheless, the model developed is useful in pointing up significant features of the biology of these systems, especially in Armadillidium, that need further exploration before a satisfactory explanation of the observations is possible.

The book is well printed and relatively free of defects. A conspicuous misprint on p. 215, substitution of "never" for "always," is easily recognized. The bibliography contains over 600 references; both subject and author index are provided. I found much to think about in this book; I recommend it to general biologists and to anyone interested in broad patterns of evolution.

Ecology Around the World

The Ecological Century. A Personal Appraisal. E. BARTON WORTHINGTON. Clarendon (Oxford University Press), New York, 1983. xvi, 206 pp., illus. $27.50.

E. Barton Worthington is a unique example of a highly competent person born in the right place at the right time (1905). He was in school when ecology was just beginning, and he was a student in the first limnology course at Cambridge. Most of the young British scientists at that time wanted experience in the African colonies. Hence it is not surprising that, only a few weeks after completing his degree at Cambridge in 1927, Worthington was involved in a fishery survey of Lake Victoria, and later, in 1930-31 in a study of some more remote lakes of Kenya and Uganda. This represents the beginning. From here on he participated, usually as director, in a steady succession of progressively grander programs. Water was involved in some way in all the projects, and so was ecology. Worthington's conception of ecology gradually developed into an ecosystem approach, which included systems analysis, economics, sociology, and even politics. The book is based on his personal experiences, but it is not an autobiography.

Worthington considers that ecology has gone through a sequential development, which can be categorized roughly by quarter centuries. The first quarter of the 20th century was mainly one of exploration, the second quarter was descriptive except for exploratory work still going on in high and low latitudes, and the third quarter was experimental. The fourth quarter sees ecology as a well-established discipline having wide applications in human affairs. Worthington calls the entire century ecological because of the emergence of ecology as one of the essential factors in planning for the persistence of spaceship Earth and its long-evolved ecosystems.

A mere listing of Worthington's responsibilities would be impressive. From 1933 to 1937 he participated in Sir Malcolm Hailey's survey of Africa south of the Sahara, during which he gradually focused more strongly on the broad ramifications of ecology. He saw many aspects of tropical diseases and parasites, crop pests, the effects of frequent fires, the effects of wild animals and forests on flow regimes downstream, and other environmental phenomena. After these African experiences he served as the first director of the Freshwater Biological Association (FBA) Laboratory on Lake Windermere from 1937 through 1946. During the war the staff was involved in increasing human food derived from the stunted perch in the lake and from silver eels. In the later years of the war and while still director of the FBA Laboratory, Worthington became involved with the Scientific Advisory Mission of the Middle East Supply Center, the chief objective of which was to reduce the dependence of the populace on materials that had to be shipped from Europe. In 1946 he was asked to prepare a 10-year development plan for Uganda. Among other things Worthington proposed a dam just below Owen Falls near the mouth of Lake Victoria, which when completed in 1954 made the lake the largest freshwater reservoir in the world. In addition, Worthington was instrumental in the establishment of the Queen Elizabeth and Murchison Falls national parks, which were highly successful in conserving wildlife up to the demise of Idi Amin's regime.

At the completion of this project, Worthington had wanted to be in England while the FBA Laboratory was being relocated. But instead he was asked to be the scientific secretary to the East African High Commission, the function of which was to set up inter-territory research centers for Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika Territory, and Zanzibar. This work in East Africa enhanced Worthington's appreciation of "holism" in ecology. Among many other activities, Worthington established a well-designed fisheries research laboratory at Jinja on Lake Victoria, and later established a sea fisheries laboratory in Zanzibar.

A major scientific conference was held in Johannesburg in 1949, which led to the establishment of the Conseil Scientifique pour l'Afrique, of which Worthington was made secretary-general. The chief function here was to coordinate research among all the colonies or regions—English, French, Belgian, and Portuguese—south of the Sahara. This was done by encouraging fundamental or long-term research and by organizing scientific conferences for the discussion of common problems. This "international"
