

states. This number results from the fact that there are two monument offices in the state of North Rhine-Westphalia and that towns with a long independent archaeological tradition, such as Cologne and Lübeck, have an additional office. Furthermore, many towns have their own archaeologist who is in charge of local excavations and also sometimes performs the task of a lower monument authority.

All state monument offices are charged with the management and protection of cultural resources. They give scientific advice and furnish opinion on all matters of historic preservation. Furthermore they carry out scientific work on methods and practice of monument care, scientific research and investigation of monuments, rescue excavation and publication. All these activities do not differ from those practised since the early beginnings of archaeology in Germany and they belong more or less to the archaeological practice taught at universities.

The new laws introduced tasks archaeologists had not been trained for: state offices were enacted by law as 'agencies of public concern' and they are expected to comment on every planning application and other municipal, county or state actions in order to achieve an adequate management decision and if possible preservation in situ of the sites and monuments that may be affected. Only step by step the staff of these state offices became trained in these matters.

CHANGES IN GERMAN HERITAGE MANAGEMENT

The new laws led to considerable changes in the focus of the tasks of the monument offices. Developing strategies for the recording, preservation and management of archaeological heritage became a central concern. Giving scientific advice and providing advice on matters of archaeological heritage as member of an 'agency of public concern' requires broad knowledge of the archaeological resource within a given area. Consequently, major efforts have been made in the last decades in enhancing data collection and increasing the use of non-intrusive methods such as survey and prospection. Databases, often combined with a geographical information system, have meanwhile been built up in all states. Information about archaeological sites will soon be accessible not only to archaeologists but also to planners and other bodies. Within a period of only thirty years German archaeology moved from a predominantly research orientated field of study to a partner acting within the process of environmental management and development.

Research and investigation of monuments and rescue excavations

All monument offices look back on a long tradition in theoretical and practical research going back to a number of research projects started in the 19th or early 20th centuries. Usually these projects are undertaken within one German state and focus on a selected site or a group of sites. Institutions such as the Rheinisch-Germanische Kommission (RGK) and the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG,
