

Walking on Water

When people ask me what I do, I say I'm a writer.

American writing took its most magnetic form for him, as he began to do his own work, in the figure of Hemingway. One of his Village Voice pieces was a comparison of two equally inadequate biographies of his hero, by Lillian Ross (sycophantic) and by Dwight MacDonald (a hatchet job). "Hemingway . . . can be spied between the two as a complete natural, engaging, bearish, bullish, joyous, witty, adolescent, pontifical, generous, and knee-high in pygmies." He admired the man, and he was inspired by the prose style. Hemingway had died only a year before he went to America for the first time, on his birthday, and, when he heard the news, he wrote to his mother (unusually addressing the letter to her alone) with strong emotion. It wasn't just the tragedy of his death, or his incomparable influence on so many other writers, it was also that he had longed to meet him, and now it was too late. "I don't get emotional about any other writer."

Hemingway's plain speech and taut narrative, at once banking down and letting out pent-up emotion, his quick-fire dialogue, his disenchanting comedy, his immersion in landscapes, his toughness muddled up with bewilderment, had a powerful effect on him. When he first saw The Birthday Party in 1962, he thought of Hemingway. In years to come, he collected his first editions, wrote about him, attended Hemingway conferences and continued to admire him. Explaining in the 1980s why he got "bitten" at twenty by Hemingway, in spite of the egotistical, ridiculous, self-parodying side of him, he talked about his "tensile quality," his astonishing expression of "the physical, sensual experience of life" (fishing, for example), his bold technical skills—how he would "leap forward in time beyond the point we have reached in the story"—and how he got his effects "by making the reader do the work." In 2008, he was still a fan, rereading A Moveable Feast with excitement and admiration.

Brennan liked doing pastiche. One of his imitations—when undertaking a mildly uncomfortable assignment—was of a tough, macho foreign correspondent plunged into a war zone with the "the whine of bullets" making "a symphony of death" all around him. But he liked parodying Hemingway best of all. Enough of bullfighting novels, said Brennan in 1962. He was going to write a Hemingway cricketing novel, and here was an extract, called "For Whom the Balls Fall: Death After Lunch."

He looked at me and then the coin went high.

My mouth was dry the way it is when you haven't brushed your teeth. I brushed my teeth all right but this is how my mouth was. You can't explain these things but you try because maybe it means something and maybe it doesn't and in the end it doesn't matter, and you know that, too.

I need this luck, I thought. I need it bad because that's all there is. The coin spun high . . . and the earth moved away and under me.

He let me see it there. He didn't say anything, and then I stopped looking . . . It was a long way back. I walked into the room. They sat quiet, waiting.

"How did it go?"

"Fine," I said. I didn't know how to tell them, but they knew how it was in my face.

"We're fielding," I said. "It's okay."

"Sure it's okay."

"That's what I said," I said.

"We could have had such a damn good time batting together."

"Yes," I said. "Isn't it pretty to think so?"

In a spoof CV sent to Smith early in 1963, Stoppard described himself as an up-and-coming young playwright who "has travelled widely to New York (where he quickly established a reputation as a Hemingway parodist in the Village Voice)" Hemingway seeped into his private writing, too. The summers of 1960 and 1962 were spent partly abroad, staying with the Smiths in a dilapidated castle in Blauvac, near Arignon, where Smith was friends with the eccentric chateraine, hitch-hiking, and meeting up with Isabel in Spain and Italy. A love letter to her, written in an all-night café in Narbonne while trying to hitch to Spain, takes on a melancholy Hemingwayish tone:
