

PSYCHOLINGUISTICS¹

BY SUSAN M. ERVIN-TRIPP AND DAN I. SLOBIN

University of California, Berkeley, California

Psycholinguistics appears to be a field in search of a definition, judging from the variety of points of view in recent summaries (17, 24, 42, 74, 112, 163, 171, 180, 249, 273, 282). We shall define it as the study of the acquisition and use of structured language. Comparative animal communication, the organic bases of language, and the social determinants of language use all fall within the purview of this survey in terms of this definition. The word "structure" is significant in our definition. A major focus of recent psycholinguistic research is on syntactic organization, a key defining feature of human language. The analysis of language structure has made demands on present psychological theories which have yet to be met.

While speech is a form of individual behavior, the grammar of the language of any individual is a construct. The old psychological distinction between "learning" and "performance" is mirrored in psycholinguistic discussions of "competence" and "performance." Any behavior involving language—imitation, comprehension, remembering, speaking—is in some way affected by the speaker's underlying knowledge of the language, by the "rules" underlying language use. Yet, like knowledge sought in mental tests, the set of rules involved in such behavior is a construct which can never be directly observed but only inferred. Linguists have been concerned with characterizing these rules as economically as possible. Proponents of the influential generative transformational approach in linguistics have clearly phrased the problem in psychological terms, stating that the task of linguistic theory is to account for a speaker's ability to produce and understand an indefinite number of new sentences, to distinguish between sentences and non-sentences of his language, and to interpret certain sorts of ill-formed sentences. Other linguists are concerned as well with the characterization of changes in the rules for producing and interpreting sentences in different styles or levels of language.

¹ The last review of psycholinguistics in these pages was that of Rubenstein & Aborn (277), which covered the field through 1958; the current review continues through June 1965. In view of the length and productivity of the period, many bibliographical omissions were necessary, and readers are referred to other review articles; also, reference is generally made only to the most recent article in a series by a given author, wherein earlier references can be found by the reader. Reviews of Soviet psycholinguistics can be found in El'konin (81), Luria (204), Slobin (293), Sokolov (295), and Zhinkin (328). We express our thanks to the many investigators who were kind enough to respond to a call for reprints, and regret that much of their work cannot be discussed here in detail. Thanks are due Miss Denise Cameron and Miss Robin Smith for their help in finding and organizing the materials on which this review is based.
