Research Report:

A Simple Questionnaire Survey Method for Studying Migration and Residential Displacement in Informal Settlements in South Africa

Introduction

It is commonly accepted that the questionnaire survey is a blunt tool of enquiry. It is, nonetheless, a necessary one: how else are social scientists to gather up-to-date information from which generalisations can be made? Because of the limitations of questionnaire surveys, researchers who do use them tend to avoid addressing complex issues. One such area is the field of migration and urbanisation studies. Increasingly, as Local Authorities and Civic Organisations negotiate the upgrading of informal settlements, there is a need for research that can provide quantitative information on the dynamics that influence domestic strategies around access to housing and employment. It is simply not adequate for the contribution of questionnaire surveys to be restricted to the incomes, occupations, ages and sexes of respondents or household members. Along with detailed information on labour market participation, household structure and links between different places of residence, information on residential movement can quantify dynamic household processes which characterise the residents of any given informal settlement. My aim in this article is to describe a cheap and reliable questionnaire survey method which can be used to identify patterns in migration and residential displacement.

Information on migration histories is not of purely academic interest: it has important planning implications. Specifically, when used in conjunction with other information on income, employment and rural commitment, information on the nature and causes of residential migration and displacement can identify different interest groups within informal settlements. It is crucial that these different interest groups, with their distinct needs and priorities, are identified and characterised before any upgrading schemes are implemented. One example of how interest groups can block the upgrading of informal settlements is provided by Friedman (1993:p.40). He cites evidence that Mozambicans living in a large informal settlement in the Transvaal were an important part of a constituency which effectively blocked the development of
