Abstract

The following survey is presented by firstly looking at the initial research carried out in the area of computer-based essay marking systems. Early researchers, inspired by natural language processing, studied how the computer might play a role in evaluating students' writing. Computer-based essay marking systems developed from late 1960's, attempted to prove that a computer can mark essays as good as any other human beings. These are Project Essay Grade-1, 2 and 3. As time goes by, more sophisticated systems are developed, such as A Simple Text Automatic Marking System, Intelligent Essay Assessor, e-rater and the program developed by S. L. Larkey. Some of these systems have explored the use of advanced computational linguistics and statistical techniques for automatically scoring a variety of writing responses. Most of these systems are promising at the research level. The paper conclusively indicates that further research needs to be carried out in order to make these programs commercially available to instructors.

Introduction

The computer was initially developed for handling numerical calculations. However, as time goes by, and as the computer gets cheaper and cheaper, other computer applications are being developed.

One of the computer applications that are widely being used is in the area of document preparation. A number of document preparation support tools are available in the market. Some of these tools are only providing support for document formatting, while others provide support authors in writing. We call them as author support tools (AST). The first effort in providing these AST was perhaps, developed within the UNIX operating system. The UNIX word processing system is known as NROFF and is supported by some other tools, for example Style and Diction. With the advent of microcomputers, new word processors have been developed. One of the
