The title of this book promises something other than it offers; the reader should approach with caution. Rather than, as it suggests, providing a systematic overview of each of the various fields of linguistics, the volume gives a set of highly idiosyncratic views of each subfield. While the articles are in general worthwhile, and the authors are all authorities whose opinions of their respective domains are to be taken seriously, it is nevertheless true that alternative views are legion; this book can certainly not be counted on to give a non-linguist an idea of what is happening in linguistics.

Actually, this is less the fault of the book itself than of the field of linguistics at present. There is at the moment dissension among the leading scholars in virtually every aspect of linguistic theory and practice, both in regard to what theories, if any, are viable; and to what the subject-matter for investigation should be. Since this is so, neither Dingwall nor anyone else could have produced a more universally-acceptable overview of the field.

The volume consists of ten articles, plus prologue and epilogue by Dingwall. The articles are as follows: Experimental Phonetics, by Chin-Wu Kim; Neurolinguistics, by Harry A. Whittaker; Experimental Psycholinguistics, by Philip B. Gough; Developmental Psycholinguistics, by Dan Slobin; Methodology, by William Labov; Generative Phonology, by Theodore M. Lightner; Historical Linguistics, by Paul Kiparsky; Linguistic Metatheory, by Barbara Hall Partee; Mathematical Linguistics, by Robert E. Wall; and Computational Linguistics, by Joyce Friedman.

Although one might quibble with the editor's choice of author in one's particular specialty, certainly it is fair to say that the authors selected are generally well within the mainstream of linguistic thought and are well-respected within their disciplines. Certainly, too, we might wonder why some fields were omitted, such as work on specific language areas as American Indian or Romance linguistics; why syntax-and-semantics is the ground covered by an article purportedly on "metatheory," and why an article on "methodology" is largely concerned with sociolinguistics. But I think in retrospect that these various choices are all perfectly defensible, although each of us, given the opportunity, would no doubt do things slightly differently.

Since there is insufficient space to review all the articles as they deserve, and since I lack the competence to do so anyway, and since anthropologically-oriented readers are apt to be interested in articles dealing with pure linguistic theory, I should like to select one article for close discussion to illustrate both the pitfalls and the virtues of this collection, the article that perhaps lies closest of all of these here to the intersection of linguistics and anthropology, William Labov's "Linguistic Methodology."

Labov notes correctly that synchronic analysis tends to produce better results for "exotic" languages than for familiar ones, especially the linguist's own, since in the latter case one encounters embarrassing variations between the grammars of native speakers. This is a problem with most current methodologies, and in particular with classical generative-transformational grammar, which has tended to look upon the grammar as representing the speech of an "idealized" speaker, and is therefore unable to accommodate the variability that Labov and others have shown is inherent in real language use. It is also true of this theoretical persuasion that it has relied on the linguist's introspection and intuition for its data, and this is problematic as well, Labov
