

as flaxseed stems, their overall carbon footprint can be smaller than that of a company that mills from recycled waste.

The production of newsprint involves very substantial amounts of energy and water use. Recycling newspaper substantially reduces the energy requirements. Recycled paper uses half as much electrical energy in its manufacture than the equivalent newsprint produced from timber. Paper manufacturers are also making significant efforts to reduce their energy needs. Many mills have their own combined heat and power plants. The steam that drives the turbines is also used to dry the paper as it is produced. Such combined heat and power plants are much more efficient than other forms of power generation. Some plants are designed to burn the fibrous waste created in the manufacturing process, thus reducing their fossil fuel consumption.

Modern mills now recycle the water that they lose in the production process. Waste water is polluted with ink and debris and there are strict controls on the pollutant content of any water that is finally discharged. Improved filters, such as the Petas Submerged Rotary Disk Fine Filtration System (manufactured by Kalsint Lamont) have been developed to reduce this problem. Filters such as Petas are active systems in which foul water moves across rotating discs while filter cake is doctored off and pumped away. High pressure pumps clean the filter while it is in operation, so that water that has passed through the filter contains very low levels of contaminant.

Newsprint production generates few harmful chemicals. In fact, Friends of the Earth says: 'Of all paper product categories, newsprint is still potentially the most benign in environmental terms.' Friends of the Earth (1992), The Environmental Consequences Of Pulp And Paper Manufacture.

Environmental issues in printing

The print process itself involves significant use of hazardous chemicals. The move to processless plates (see page 102) can significantly reduce this and environmental considerations are likely to be a factor influencing the take-up of this technology. There have also been changes, such as the use of water washable flexographic plates that do not need to be cleaned out with chlorine-based solutions in the platemaking process. Even so, the print industry still produces significant amounts of hazardous waste. Both the EU and the US now require producers of such waste to register. In the EU, it has been compulsory to register since 2000 if more than 200 litres of hazardous waste is produced annually. Chemical washers used in cleaning presses (especially those used in cleaning offset letter blankets), mean that newspaper printers will generate above 200 litres of waste and are required to register.

Printing uses significant amounts of VOCs, which are seen both as environmentally hazardous and as a danger to the health of workers. The emission of VOCs from printers is regulated in the EU by Directive 1999/13/EC. All printing works are expected to comply with this directive by 31 October 2002. There is also regulatory control of VOC emissions in North America. The EU has highlighted concerns about solvents used in cleaning printing equipment. In 2002 it claimed that EU newspaper printing plants, printing four colour
