Growing Cities

We have long been used to thinking of Russia as a peasant country. Even now some people describe the unflinching heroism of the Red Army to the "mystical" love of the muzhik for his soil. However, even the most "mystical" soil can not produce tanks and airplanes; they are the product of industries and cities which have grown up with incredible rapidity.

On January 1, 1939, one-third of the population of the Soviet Union, or 55.9 million people, lived in cities. That is more than the entire population of Great Britain, though considerably less than the 94.6 millions living in cities or Metropolitan districts in the United States. One-half of the Soviet urban population or 27.4 million, lived in 82 cities with more than 100,000 inhabitants; these are comparable to 108 Metropolitan Districts in the same class in the U. S. A.

Twelve years earlier, or January 1, 1927, there had been only 33 Soviet cities of this size, and the entire urban population had been only 26.3 millions, less than half of the 1939 figure, and only slightly more than before the revolution. The city builders of the Soviet Union had to accommodate thirty million new city dwellers within little more than a decade.

Organization of City Planning

They were not too well prepared for this gigantic task. The medieval Russian cities had been not much more than big villages; the ancient urban culture of Transcaucasia and Central Asia had left great monuments, but hardly a living tradition. For Peter's new capital on the Neva the great city building art of the baroque period created its masterpiece on a gigantic scale; up to the middle of the nineteenth century the best architects of the country controlled its development by the means of the absolute state; many provincial cities of the 18th and early 19th also show the influence of this great tradition.

In spite of this, the rapid growth of cities during the half century following the abolition of serfdom was as chaotic in Russia as it was in America during the same period.

The October Revolution at once evoked a lively interest in city planning, but only after the intervention had been beaten off could practical work get under way. It was carried on mainly on the accepted lines of European city planning. New industrial settlements were built on the pattern of garden cities. The first of these were at the
