

Statistical Decision Models: Frameworks for Improved Decision-Making in Organizations

Topic: Sciences | Words: 1212 | Pages: 5

The accuracy of the research's results depends on the statistical test chosen to measure variables. To decide what specific test to choose for the study, it is necessary to analyze the variables' character. Considerations made during the decision process can be organized according to a series of questions to direct the process of choosing tests. The statistical decision model is necessary to direct the researcher's decision-making process and to assist in choosing the appropriate approach to conduct the statistical analysis.

Decision Model and Explanation of Steps

To choose the statistical test, the researcher should focus on the information about variables, samples, and purpose of the study. The first step is the analysis of the presented variables: What number, types, and scales are used for IVs/DVs? These features are important to be noted because they are different for different tests. If researchers state that they have 1 categorical IV with 3 levels (the nominal scale), the use of the ANOVA is more appropriate than the use of t tests. To choose the test correctly, it is also necessary to discuss samples because the type of ANOVAs depends on the sample.

The final question about the purpose of the study will help to make the right decisions to test hypotheses. The model was created according to the algorithm, followed by researchers while discussing the study's features. The most difficult part was to organize the algorithm in an
