

The Audio-tutorial Approach in Teaching Woody Plant Materials¹

F. O. Lanphear
Department of Horticulture
Purdue University
Lafayette, Indiana

We are experiencing dramatic changes in the technology of communication. Yet the academic community has been unusually slow in adapting new technology to the university classroom. We continue to use the traditional lecture approach in most of our classes, thus keeping the student in a passive, semi-involved role.

This is not to suggest that new methods are not being tried. There are innovations occurring in education, but unfortunately, the rate of change is slow. This criterion need not indicate satisfaction with the present educational format. Professors are under pressure, by administrators and the scientific community, to be productive research scientists first, thus limiting their role in the classroom to a secondary priority. Consequently, innovation is much more probable in the laboratory than in the classroom.

The primary responsibility of a university should be effective and stimulating instruction. With this idealistic goal as an objective, let us consider one recent innovation—the audio-tutorial method and its implications to teaching horticulture.

This method, which is described in detail by Postlethwait et al. (2) places emphasis on the learning ability of the individual student. It allows independent study with the aid of many learning events integrated into a meaningful sequence. As a result, the slow learner has the opportunity to repeat the process as often as necessary while the faster learner is encouraged to move more rapidly, without the delay frequently experienced in a classroom situation. Recognizing that learning takes place through a variety of experiences, this method allows a stepwise sequence of acquiring background information and immediate observation and/or experimentation to reinforce the learning experience. Traditionally this takes place in
