The length should be well known from previous saddleings; however, it can also be estimated by approximating from the ground by extending the leather just enough to the length of the rider's arm. The left strap should initially be at a comfortable length during the mounting procedure so as not to cause undue strain on the part of the rider.<sup>1</sup>

As soon as the rider has mounted the horse he should immediately proceed to cinch himself to ensure that the horse will remain standing still. The rider should use straps to cinch and position them on the full of the back (the

The Mounting Process

Figure 10. The rider places her foot in the stirrup while diagonally facing the horse so that the horse is inhibited from walking past the mounting rider.
