

Siegel also made notable contributions to a new series, which began inconspicuously in Adventure Comics #247 (April 1958). Written by Otto Binder and drawn by Al Plastino, "The Legion of Super-Heroes" showed Superboy traveling to the future to join a club full of kids with amazing powers. Somehow the idea struck a chord, and when the Legion returned for further adventures, Siegel was the dominant writer, with illustrations by Curt Swan, Jim Mooney, and George Papp. Eventually John Forte became the regular artist, and his plain, direct representation of potentially absurd characters like Bouncing Boy and Lightning Lad helped give the series its charm. By 1962 the Legion (with Superboy) was appearing in every issue of Adventure Comics, but before much longer Siegel was gone from DC, launching another unsuccessful lawsuit in the hope of getting the rights to Superman.

Pulp veteran Edmond Hamilton took over the Legion scripts, and eventually Curt Swan took up the pencils. Swan was already doing the covers for most of the Superman line, not to mention an increasing number of the interior stories. Gradually his version of Superman superseded that of Wayne Boring, whose nearly thirty years of work on Superman came to an end in 1967. "I made certain changes from Wayne Boring's concept that Mort liked. Some of them he suggested. Boring had a very stylized presentation of people in general and Superman in particular. Mort felt that the jaw was too large, for example," Swan said. At the same time he admired his predecessor's approach: "It was kind of cartoony, but I thought it was very good." The trend away from simple cartooning to progressively more detailed and realistic illustration led Superman from Joe Shuster to Wayne Boring to Curt Swan, and eventually beyond. Swan admitted that he had to exaggerate the character's musculature to get the right effect, yet his was a convincingly human Man of Steel that still has its advocates as the ultimate depiction.
