one that could reshape the galaxy's future First Manned Rocket Launch Jean Paul Pallud, 2025-03-31 This is a very nice reference book that contains a well written informative text subject specific photographs well detailed captions and more all detailing Erich Bachem's Ba 349 Natter Aeroscale Well before Yuri Gagarin or Alan Shepard Lothar Sieber became the first man to take off vertically from the ground under rocket power on March 1 1945 The plane crashed after flying for 55 seconds and he was killed The launch marked a milestone on the road to spaceflight even though it remained virtually unknown to the general public for more than half a century But the Natter was a weapon of war born out in the closing months of World War II when Germany was desperately looking for wonder weapons to fight the inevitable defeat A vertical take off rocket fighter the Natter would reach the Allied bomber altitude in seconds then the pilot would get within firing distance of a bomber and fire all 24 rockets into the nose in a single shot Its fuel running out the pilot will then glide the plane at high speed to a lower altitude at which point he will trigger the plane to break up a large parachute opening at the rear popping off the nose and the pilot with it The pilot and the tail with the Walter rocket engine would land under their separate parachutes while the disposable nose fuselage and wings were to crash to the ground The Natter is unquestionably an exciting aircraft but it is safe to assume that it would have been a failure as a bomber interceptor Soviet Military Review ,1977 The Hynek UFO Report J.
