

SUPPORTING LITERACY DEVELOPMENT IN AAC USERS

The ability to develop and access literacy skills is known to improve access to education materials, financial understanding, increase job opportunities, and foster independence in individuals with disabilities. Literacy skills for individuals who utilize augmentative and alternative communication (AAC) are extremely important, as these skills promote authentic self-expression outside of pre-programmed messages, provide a means of educational accessibility and learning, enhance vocational opportunities, and improve advocacy. Unfortunately, children who require AAC are at risk for delayed semantic, syntactic, and morphological development due to altered communicative experiences and limited experiences with various forms of language.¹ Additionally, children utilizing AAC and who may be non-speaking are at significant risk of delayed phonological awareness skills and altered speech sound understanding. Compounding factors that may impact an AAC user's literacy learning may include intrinsic factors such as visual, hearing, motor, cognitive, and/or speech/language impairments and extrinsic factors such as physical contexts such as home and school environment, social contexts, and language contexts.¹ Despite this, the acquisition of literacy skills in children utilizing AAC is crucial for long-term communicative success, independence, and quality of life.

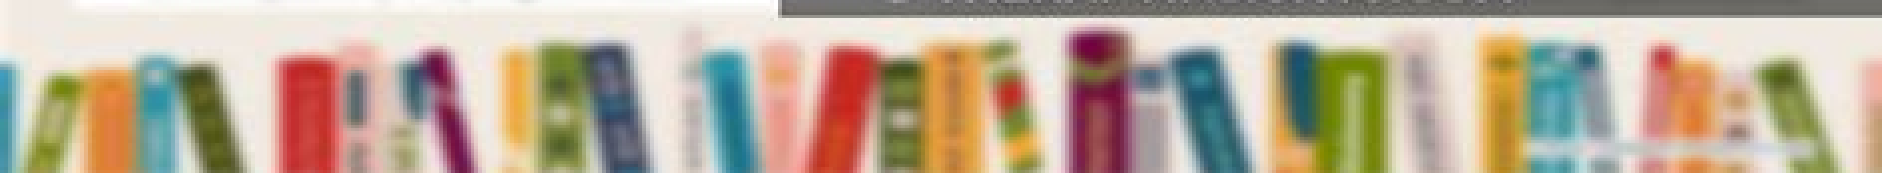

Five principles to guide literacy instruction for students with intellectual and developmental disabilities²

1. All people are capable of learning literacy skills.
2. Literacy is a human right and is also an important part of how people experience the world and experience quality of life.
3. Literacy involves communication and connections with others, rather than being solely an individual experience.
4. Literacy encompasses all forms of communication.
5. Children's literacy development should be a team effort and the responsibility of any single individual.

Some specific strategies to utilize during early literacy opportunities for children who utilize AAC include:

- Use modeling or aided language stimulation during activities as these strategies can be effective in introducing new vocabulary.
 - Use supplemental communication boards with targeted vocabulary specific to the book. You can also program the child's personal device with vocabulary specific to reading. Consider using symbols within applications as these provide great opportunities for receptive learning during discussion opportunities.
 - Introduce opportunities for initiation during structured settings to increase participation and overall learning. Consider how often you can do repetition and how you can be intentional as to what you want your child to learn, either speech-generating devices or non-communication during story reading. Learning words to participate in discussion during structured activities.
 - Use a model of story structure to present during structured opportunities.
 - Consider using picture books with a communication focus, such as books that focus on communication skills. Consider the vocabulary associated with being able to communicate.
 - Model the use of symbols throughout the book reading experience without necessarily having the child use them.
 - Increase exposure to literacy opportunities with parents, caregivers, siblings, and community through activities to use the opportunities and maximize available opportunities.
 - Consider incorporating children with no spoken language using physical therapy or occupational therapy, or reading materials as well as accessibility of various communication and communication systems to support other strategies.
- Communication and literacy development are important skills that contribute to the functioning of all people. Including children with complex communication needs in literacy activities can help them develop literacy skills, which can lead to improved communication and literacy skills. Learning to read and write is a skill that is essential for many people in our society.
