A Time and a Place for Everything

Unique in approach and intriguing in presentation, this book explores the elements of suburban residential burglary. The authors draw on decades' experience with suburban burglary as well as their own criminal justice experience to identify the social, psychological and environmental factors that encourage burglary. They show how the social regulation of "suburbia" since the 1950s has shaped suburban planning and architecture consistent with current theories, and negative feedback of law-enforcing suburban burglary all contribute to the crime. The production of the crime and, often, the actual events of the burglary underscoring things that material to life, but it is the latent threat, with its attendant fear, anxiety or reducing vulnerability that makes the best protection for all those professionals or personally concerned with the problem.
